NEED ONLY STATE PARK IN THIS AREA

We can see no necessity for the creation of TWO state parks in the immediate Lynchburg or Central Piedmont area. The nearby Holliday Lake area is potentially one of the greatest recreational areas in the state. The lake itself is unsurpassed and the thousands of acres of land offer tremendous development possibilities. Why not concentrate available state park funds at Holliday Lake, rather than starting from scratch with a new state park development in Amherst county near Lynchburg? We hope that our representatives in the legislature will work for ranking of Holliday Lake as a full-fledged state park, and try to enlist the support of the Amherst and Lynchburg legislators to support them. Better one major state park, than two partially developed recreational areas.

REACH THE QUOTA

The U. S. Navy Recruiting Service has set a goal of 500 recruits from Virginia for the month of October. Uncle Sam's fighting ships need men.....now. Virginia is a great "Navy State" and this quota should be reached. The opportunities offered by the Navy are manyfold. The Navy offers you free training in a wide variety of trades, as well as a chance to see the world and draw excellent pay. The ages begin at 17. The Times-Virginian has a number of booklets on the U. S. Navy. Come by and look at them.

AMERICAN PLANES

Some experts are now telling that many of the American planes sent to England are not good enough to take part in the present air battles over Europe. America will have to, if not already so doing, produce better planes...with more armor plate, and fire power and with more horse power in the motors.

Despite our disappointment in the production effort here to date, there is another angle to this situation.....the great accumulated air might of Hitler is fast getting out of date too! By spring, a big percentage of German planes won't be able to fly against Planes that were the world's best five years ago, won't be tops in the 1942 campaign! Germany is now producing top-notch planes, don't forget that...but their accumulation of planes won't benefit them much longer.

NOT A GREAT ASSET

More and more it is becoming evident that Italy will be the weak link in the Axis. Already under heavy taxation, the fine people of Italy will become more and more resentful of the yoke of an unwanted war. Perchance the time will come when the heel of Italy will be the landing spot of an Allied invasion army, and that after which Germany, Italy and the Balkan states will see homes for the grand land assault on Germany.

Hunger will eventually drive the peoples of Europe to rebel against Hitlerism.

World's Biggest Non-Rigid Airship

The world's largest non-rigid airship, the K-3, which was described by naval commander C. S. Knox as satisfactory, following a test flight at Akron, Ohio. Also of interest is the fact that the 216-foot, $325,000 blimp will be equipped with machine guns, torpedoes and depth charges.

Lights of New York

by L. L. STEVENSON

One of New York's belt-known links with the long past is Frances' Tavern at Broad and Pearl streets. Easy of access, it has been visited by thousands of tourists. It has a part in history, not only of the city but of the nation because of what occurred there December 4, 1783. On that day, George Washington's officers assembled in the "Long Room" on the second floor. It was a solemn occasion since they had met to say farewell to their commander-in-chief. After the farewell, Washington surrendered his commission. The "Long Room" is now very much as it was in Washington's time since the building has been restored by the Sons of the American Revolution and is open to the public, with many Colonial relics on display.

Not long after 1700, Fraunces' Tavern was built as a residence by a French Huguenot, Etienne de Lancey, a descendant of Guy de Lancey. Etienne de Lancey came by a small fortune in his homeland and emigrated to America where he established himself as a merchant and in time grew wealthy. De Lancey street, on the lower East Side was named after him. It is not known exactly what time the residence was changed into a public house, but in 1739 entertainments and dinners were known to have been held there. Frances opened his tavern there in 1762, but it changed hands several times before the Revolution. Then Frances regained possession and it has gone down through the years bearing his name instead of that of the man who built it.

Not far away from Frances' Tavern is another link with Colonial days in New York, St. Paul's chapel, on Broadway between Fulton and Vesey streets. As a matter of fact, it is the only church in New York that dates back to pre-Revolutionary days. Built in 1766 as a chapel of Trinity parish, after the burning of Trinity in 1776, it became the parish church. Among the worshipers were Lord Howe and Major Andre and the English midshipman who afterward became King George IV. President Washington at both houses of congress marched to St. Paul's after his inauguration at Federal Hall and Wall streets for a service conducted by Bishop Prevoost, chaplain of the senate. Afterward, so long as New York remained the capital, President Washington was a regular attendant.

St. Paul's is unique in the fact that it turns its back on Broadway, the front, with the slim spire, facing toward the Hudson. In the old days, a pleasant lawn sloped down to the water's edge which was then where Greenwich street is now. On the Broadway portico is a monument to Maj.-Gen. Richard Montgomery, who on December 31, 1775, with Col. Benedict Arnold, led the assault on Quebec and was mortally wounded in battle. Congress ordered the monument in 1776 and Benjamin Franklin purchased it in Paris. It was shipped to America on a private vateer. A British gunboat captured the privateer, but the gunboat in turn was taken by Americans shortly and in time, the monument reached its destination.

St. Paul's churchyard are a number of old red sand stone graves stones, badly treated by the passing years, on which are chubby faced winged cherubs. I have noticed them in cemeteries in Westchester county and elsewhere, but though I've made many inquiries have not succeeded in ascertaining their origin. Once a year, the path through the churchyard is barred. Federists find it a convenient cut-off between Broadway and Vesey street and the barriers are erected to keep it from becoming public property.

While strolling on lower Fifth avenue just after leaving St. Paul's the other afternoon, I thought the New York of the past really had come back. Passing was an old-fashioned carriage with crests on the doors, riding behind were two footmen with cockades and pigskin jackets. The driver was also very correct, and in the carriage rode a lady who reminded me of pictures of Queen Victoria. Some day I hope to find out who she is.

At Broadway and Forty-second street, a furtive young man sidled up to me and whispered that he had a bargain in a diamond. He didn't say that it was stolen, but his manner indicated it had been. Just as he was on the point of taking it from his pocket, a detective came along and the young man disappeared, so I'll never know how big a sucker I look—or at least he thought I looked.

SCHENCK:
Entertainer

(See Below.)

The great movie probe in Washington took an amusing turn when Nicholas Schenck, MGM president, was called to the stand for two days of questioning, kept the spectators in stitches, and confused many of his inquisitors by his answers.

Schenck, maintaining that there was no "eight-company" trust in Hollywood, admitted several instances of family ties between rival companies—and then, just when the attorneys thought they had him cornered, he blandly said that was just the trouble—that members of these families wouldn't do business with each other.

The film magnates had maintained that there was no "get into war" propaganda, but that pictures were made strictly with entertainment value in mind, and in accordance with the feelings of the majority of the nation about the dictatorships and aggressions.

The committee had tried to show that the big companies could assure the financial success of a picture, whatever its entertainment value might be, and that the entertaining picture brought in by an outsider could not succeed if the big companies didn't want it to.

This Schenck flatly denied. He said:

"I might wish it were true—but it isn't."

JAPAN:
Watching Reds

What Nippon finally would decide to do about the far eastern situation would finally be decided by the position of the Russo-German war after winter sets in, had been the view expressed by observers in India.

They had held that if Russia was to continue her defense and if there was nothing resembling a wholesale collapse, then the Japanese are not likely to risk an assault on Vladivostok.

The Japanese imperialists were pictured as bluffing, watching and waiting from week to week to see which way the war car would jump on the Russian front.

Japan already had been pictured as embarrassed no end by the lack of credit, and frowned upon the prospect of a complete shut down on vital raw materials such as rubber and oil.

Also Japan, it had been held, was realizing that the British were growing stronger and stronger in the Pacific, that the United States was growing more and more in that direction, both of these making Nippon's position more precarious.

ARGENTINE:
Cracks Down

Argentina, following a long period of "creeking down" on Nazi infiltration, moved still more strongly in occupying all military airports of the country with regular detachments of army troops.

The congress was investigating Nazi activities in the country and it had been the feeling that the troop occupation might have been the result of revelations of a Nazi plot.

A lieutenant-colonel, a captain and a lieutenant, all in the army air corps, were arrested summarily, and the committee conducting the investigation admitted that they were held because of their alleged involvement in a gigantic air plot.

An attack by the German press on Argentina, it was believed, hastened the drastic action.

WEEKLY NEWS ANALYSIS — By Edward C. Wayne

Repeal of United States Neutrality Law And Arming of Merchant Shipping Cited as Administration Objectives In Battle to Keep Sea Lanes Open

(EDITOR'S NOTE—When opinions are expressed in these columns, they are those of the news analyst and not necessarily of this newspaper).

(Released by Western Newspaper Union.)

ARM SHIPS:
Asks Roosevelt

The revision of the Neutrality act to permit the arming of U. S. merchant ships had followed in order of the presidential requests after the sinking of the Pink Star, another taken over Danish vessel, near the shore where the Sessa and the Montana went down.

This vessel, first actually to be sunk since the President's shoot first message, was taken as Hitler's reply to this country's attitude on freedom of the seas.

Shortly thereafter the White House campaign to get the neutrality law changed began, with many statements by members of congress that it was believed congressional consent would be given.

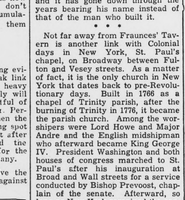
Observers in the national capital remembered that the arming of U. S. merchant vessels in World War I was followed by actual entry into the war in less than a month. It was deemed certain that anti-interventionists would fight to the last ditch against the proposal.

The immediate Berlin reaction to the new Washington move had been that the sinking of the Pink Star was entirely in accord with international law, that the vessel was armed, was convoyed by enemy craft and was carrying the flag of Panama, not of the United States.

But Rome had come forward with this statement: "Axis ships will defend themselves against any armed U. S. merchantmen they meet on their courses." That was written by Virginio Gayda, chief Fascist editor.

CUT PROFITS:
Says Morgenthau

One step to insure an "all-out" American effort in behalf of the national defense, will be to cut all



Treasury Secretary Morgenthau is shown as he told congress that a tax law should be written to take away "all business profits above six per cent of invested capital."

corporate profits to not more than 6 per cent of invested capital, declared Secretary of the Treasury Morgenthau in a statement to congress.

This drastic recommendation had been made by the secretary before the house banking and currency committee, when he urged speedy approval of the price control bill.

Here was the way the secretary had expressed himself:

"The only way that can be done is through another tax bill. We feel that due to this emergency a corporation should be satisfied to earn 6 per cent of its capital, and that everything above that should go to pay for defense expenditures."

Expressing his disapproval of a wage ceiling, Mr. Morgenthau had said:

"In free countries labor is not a commodity, human beings are not property, and they should not be treated as such."

This stand was opposed to that of Bernard Baruch, who regarded labor simply as an item of cost, and who held that it would be impossible to set ceilings on prices and not set ceilings on labor costs which went to make up those prices.

FARMERS:
Asked to Produce

Secretary of Agriculture Wickard had called on the American farmer not only to produce more food to satisfy expanding demands in the United States, but also to provide enough for England to defeat Hitler.

He was urging farm workers to seek deferment from military service to that end, even if they had to appeal from the rulings of local draft boards.

He disclosed that officials of this country had promised to send the British a vast supply of food by the end of next June that would require a billion out of the six billions required for lease-lend aid in the next bill to go before congress.

He said that while it was true that farm prices showed big percentage increases, that was because for so long farm prices had been bargain prices.

He also pointed out that increases in retail food prices were not altogether to be blamed on farm increases.

RUSSIANS:
Backs to Wall

Discounting any resistance the Russians might have put up in the center, and disregarding the big estimates of the cost of German attacks, it had become evident that the Nazis, finally, were gaining on of their three major objectives, Kiev and Leningrad—and that the Red forces had their backs to the wall.

The Kiev disaster in the south was finally admitted by Moscow which had issued statements denying the leadership of Marshal Budenny to have been "incompetent" in the Soviet opposition, now from Hungary, Rumania and Italy joining with the Nazi blitzkrieg in the early battle.

There were many who believed, however, that the Russian seven reverses in the south did not stop until the Nazis removed some of their best troops from the center, thereby giving Timoshenko time and bolstering up their drive s in the Ukraine and on the north.

At Leningrad the Germans had reached the point of claiming the street-fighting had started, and the Finns, by no means admitting themselves out of the battle, told of the capture of an important power source for the Soviet's second city.

Actual support of the Russian war effort by members of the Royal Air Force finally had been reported, however, the R.A.F. fighters having managed to get their planes to the Russian front at an unannounced point and going into action, reporting the destruction of seven Messerschmitts with the loss of only one British fighter plane.

This was the first actual fighting force placed in the Russian defense since the start of the German invasion about 100 days previously.

HURRICANE:
Season Here

The season of tropical storms arrived with a bang, a new storm striking Houston, Texas, head on, just three days after the equinox.

Official notice of dollars' damage was done—the weather bureau, having charted many hurricanes correctly, making a mistake on but one, and informing the Texas metropolis of safety in that end, even if they had to appeal from the rulings of local draft boards.

SHIPS FREED:
Strikers Back Down

Strikers among the seamen of the A. F. of L. "Seafarers' Union" had called membership meetings to discuss the "sensible thing to do" with regard to 25 strike-bound ships.

The immediate action was to free three of them at once. Also the unions voted to accept governmental mediation with regard to the rest. The government had taken possession of three other ships and had sent them to sea with Maritime Commission crews.

A. Moses, Surveyor, dated November 28, 1922, recorded in the said Clerk's Office in Deed Book 23, page 341, along with the deed from the said Wright to W. R. Reynolds.

The property has on it a ten-room frame house with bath room, wired for electric lights with the fixtures in it. Water to the house is supplied from an excellent well. The residence is located on a beautiful site from which the Town of Appomattox can be seen a mile away. The yard has a number of trees, attractive shrubbery and is surrounded by a hedge. On the property are a five-room tenant house, a barn, three tobacco barns and other outbuildings. The land is fertile and is in a high state of cultivation. It is excellent grain, grass and tobacco land. The property fronts about 3,053 feet on the highway, is close to stores, churches, schools and railway station at Appomattox, Virginia. It is well watered by two creeks and branches, and has ample wood land on it for domestic purposes. Approximately fifty acres lying nearest the Town of Appomattox is suitable for subdivision into residence sites.

The property will be offered for sale first in two parcels— one consisting of the residence tracts, containing approximately 113.27 acres, and the other consisting of the field nearest Appomattox, containing approximately 51.82 acres, with the right reserved to offer the said property as a whole after the offering it in parcels and to accept the best result.

The property is now occupied by tenants. The right is reserved for the tenants to harvest and remove their share of the crops for the current year. The landlord's share of the crops will not be sold under the deed of trust, but all crops for the current year will be removed before December 1, 1941. Seeding possession will be given as crops are removed from the land, and full possession will be given as of December 1, 1941.

TERMS: Cash. Taxes and insurance to be prorated as of the date of sale.

T. G. HOBBS,
Surviving Trustee

NOTE: If any prospective purchaser is not in a position to pay cash, it is possible that if he will see the Trustee before the sale arrangements may be made to borrow a substantial portion of the purchase price to be secured by deed of trust on the property.
